Nurses pressing for more autonomy

They say their movement will ease shortages at hospitals.

By David S. Mustard
WASHINGTON
Nurses are pushing for more autonomy in the way they practice their profession, and they say it will help ease shortages at hospitals. The American Nurses Association, which represents more than 1 million nurses, is leading the effort. The group is asking Congress to pass a law that would give nurses the same level of autonomy as doctors. The law would also give nurses the same level of responsibility as doctors. The group says that nurses are already doing this work, but they are not getting the same pay or recognition as doctors. The group says that nurses are the backbone of the healthcare system, and they are doing a lot of the work that doctors do. Signing cuts, Obama lets priorities slip

By David S. Mustard
WASHINGTON
President Obama's signing of a budget bill that cuts $110 billion from the federal budget over the next five years has raised concerns that his administration is letting its priorities slip. The bill, which was passed by Congress last week, would cut funding for a wide range of programs, including education, healthcare, and social services. The bill would also cut the number of federal employees by 2.5 million. The bill would also cut the number of federal employees by 2.5 million.
