

What was it like in the olden days? About 150 years ago, a New England village was a small, quiet place. There were no cars or trucks on its dirt streets, and no airplanes flying overhead. People rode from place to place on horseback or in horse-drawn buggies. The village shops stood close together around the common pasture, where people could leave their horses and other animals to graze.

