Although GDP is a reasonably good measure of a nation's output, it is not an accurate measure of a nation's well-being.

Which of the following options are either not accounted for or are measured inaccurately in calculations of GDP for the United States? Choose all that apply.

☐ The value of babysitting services, when the babysitter is paid in cash and the transaction isn't reported to the government

☐ The Brazilian wood that is used for flooring in a new U.S. house

☑ The costs of overfishing and other overly intensive uses of resources

☑ The quality of goods available to consumers

☐ Federal government paychecks to soldiers
