Continuous data typically involves fluctuating numbers between two presumed points. When these data points are connected on a graph, it will often result in a distinct line.