... meeting over it in red and gold, and beyond the old house, its windows flaming in the sunshine, and fiery spikes of blossom lingering before it.
Still and quiet, filled with repose it looked; times had changed since the old M. F. H.'s day, when the house overflowed with guests, and the woods and lanes echoed to the crack of rifles or the ringing horn; times had changed since the sad winning smile of the first Charles had rested on gallant liars, marshalling to the signal of boot-and-s but the halo of old romance was still there Now came the sound of hoofs, the crisp dead leaves, and riding like canopies of crimson and gold, came
