Microsoft started rolling out its Windows 365 cloud PC platform on Tuesday, allowing customers to purchase Windows 10 (and eventually Windows 11) essentially as a service streaming from the cloud. A free trial version of the platform was available at launch, but Microsoft is now pausing all free trials for Windows 365.

According to Microsoft, the reason for cutting off free trials is because of overwhelming demand for its new product.

"Following significant demand, we have reached capacity for Windows 365 trials," reads an official note on the Microsoft 365 Twitter account. "We have seen unbelievable response to Windows 365 and need to pause our free trial program while we provision additional capacity," adds Scott Manchester, director of Windows 365 program management.

So, is Microsoft really saying "we can see Windows 365 is going to be hugely popular, so we do not need to offer a free trial because people will just pay"?
